VOICE OF THE WEEK. BY ALMENA C. SAUNDERS. Another week! Ah who shall read

Upon the mighty scroll of time-The record of these seven days, Of mirth, and misery, love, and crime? Reveal to us, ye fleet-winged band, What each has witnessed till the sun Sent his last glance from western hills, Proclaiming that your task was done.

Soft, was the deep, and mellow voice Of her who first the solemn spell, Broke with a vision of the morn. Made vocal by the chime of bells: "I wear a regal crown," she said, "For when the Prince of Heaven was I wore upon my brow the star, Which led him to his home again

My robes are, first, the twilight gauze; That lightly float, and softly trail, That Sol may not too soon awake, The blossoms sleeping in the vale: Ah! Mine it is, to witness much Of joy, and grief, ere yet-I lay Upon the dusky brow of night,-The fainting shadow of the day.

Wair forms have knelt with pallid lips. To ask from earth a sweet release: And troubled spirits plucked, at last-The golden olive leaf of peace: Sweet eyes have brightened with such tear A conly from those fountains flow-The hidden Marahs of the soul, How bitter, those who taste, but know.

I saw the bride with flushing chook, Glowing from her bridal veil, While yet the wreath lay on her curls -Droop like a white rose, crushed and pale And well I marked, that from the throng-Was fied the light of many an eye, That flashed with brilliance, when before-My banners lit the eastern sky."

And what can'st thou relate? I said; Who claim'st Luna, asthy Queen? Hast thou not from thy flying car, Looked down upon a brighter scene? 6-From role to pole, I vainly sought Some drop of unalloyed bliss; Some blossom, which may never bloom In such a poisoned air as this."

Then in a chorus-joined the seven, Of mirth, and sadness, lov, and woe: Of hearts that blossom tike the rose, Which agonized an boar ago: Of long missed faces, flashing in Upon a hearth stone circle, bright; Where features from a calm repose-Lit, and grow radiant with delight.

And chambers where the paling lamp Shines o'er the features of the dead: Of war and carnage, and the smoke Which half conceals the ghastly slain; And blood from young and glowing hearts, Poured out upon the soil, like rain.

And shall it e'er be thus! I said, While evels after cycle rolls! Has easth no fortress we may gain? No bright Elysium, where souls May drink their deep, and pure draughts; For which the restless spirit yearns-And view those mountains of delight, To which the fancy fondly turns?

"Forever thus! Forever thus!" A solemn spectre made reply; "So long as clouds go up and down, Upon the blue halls of the sky;" The spirit chafes within in its chaips, Its prison of mortality; And wildly flutters, to regain Its impress of divinity.

Faint Spirit-Soon, in some pure sphere-With all thy vast capacity-And with thy mental visions clear. From every gross obscursty— Shall life's great problem all be solved, And every mental mist disperse; And the great text book of the mind, The wonders of the Universe. Krozs, Feb. 9th, 1857.
